NOTES ON THE CONTRIBUTORS

JASON ANTROSIO is an associate professor in the Department of Anthropology at Hartwick College. His doctoral work in Colombia was published as "Inverting Development Discourse in Colombia" (American Anthropologist, December 2002), and a translated version of his dissertation is forthcoming from Abya-Yala Publishers (Quito, Ecuador). The research for this article was supported by the Hartwick College Faculty Research Grants Program.

MOISÉS ARCE is an associate professor in the Department of Political Science at the University of Missouri. He is the author of Market Reform in Society: Post-Crisis Politics and Economic Change in Authoritarian Peru (2005). His current research examines the changing basis of antigovernment mobilizations against economic liberalization at the subnational level in Latin America.

MERIKE BLOFIELD is an assistant professor of political science at the University of Miami. Her publications include The Politics of Moral Sin: Abortion and Divorce in Spain, Argentina and Chile (Routledge, 2006) and articles in Comparative Politics and Latin American Politics and Society. She is also the director of the Observatory on Inequality in Latin America, a three-year project funded by the Ford Foundation. Her current research focuses on domestic workers' rights and on the impact of socioeconomic inequality on politics.

JOHN F. COLLINS is an assistant professor of anthropology at Queens College and the City University of New York Graduate Center. His first book, The Revolt of the Saints: Memory and Redemption in the Twilight of Brazilian "Racial Democracy," is a historical ethnography of the making of a UNESCO World Heritage Site in Salvador, Bahia, Brazil, forthcoming from Duke University Press. He is currently working on Under English Eyes, an examination of slavery, freedom, state-sponsored philanthropy, and liberalism in the mid-nineteenth-century South Atlantic. He has also begun a new ethnographic project on the cultural politics of class as related to whitetail deer hunting—and civilization and barbarism—in modern New Jersey. Collins is also the author of numerous scholarly articles and essays that have appeared in Ethnos, Cultural Anthropology, Comparative Studies in Society and History, Portuguese Literary and Cultural Studies, and Critique of Anthropology.

RUDI COLLOREDO-MANSFELD is an associate professor of anthropology at the University of North Carolina–Chapel Hill and a visiting professor at the Facultad Latinoamericana de Ciencias Sociales, Ecuador. Since 1991, he has researched the changing economies of the Ecuadorian Andes and the cultural spaces of postagrarian provincial society. He has published recently on the anthropology of consumption, community justice, and indigenous artists and is currently completing a manuscript on Andean civil society. Research for this article was funded by a Fulbright Lecturing/Research Award and by a Faculty Scholar Award from the University of Iowa.

Latin American Research Review, Vol. 44, No. 1. © 2009 by the Latin American Studies Association.

TRACY BECK FENWICK is a D.Phil. candidate in politics at the University of Oxford. In her dissertation she compares the reforms and varying performance of the implementation of the federal cash-transfer program in Brazil and Argentina. Her current research interests are municipalities in federalist structures and government performance.

RAÚL GARCÍA-HERAS teaches economic history at the University of Buenos Aires and is a senior research fellow in Argentina's National Scientific Research Council (CONICET). He specializes in the business and economic history of contemporary Argentina. His latest publications are Historia empresarial e historia económica en la Argentina: Un balance a comienzos del siglo XXI (Facultad de Administración de la Universidad de los Andes, 2007) and El Fondo Monetario Internacional y el Banco Mundial en la Argentina (Universidad de los Andes, 2008). He is now working on a book about the role of major private international banks in Argentina's foreign financing from 1955 to 1983.

NOAM LUPU is a Ph.D. candidate in the Department of Politics at Princeton University. His research focuses on the causes of party realignments in Latin America, examining intraparty organizations, voting behavior, and subnational politics. His other research interests include the development of partisanship in new democracies, the voter base of new left governments in the region, and the effects of inequality on redistributive policies.

ALFRED P. MONTERO is an associate professor of political science at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota. His research focuses on the political economy of state reform and particularly decentralization in Latin America and Western Europe. He is the author of Shifting States in Global Markets: Subnational Industrial Policy in Contemporary Brazil and Spain and Brazilian Politics: Reforming a Democratic State in a Changing World. He is also coeditor, with David Samuels, of Decentralization and Democracy in Latin America. Montero has published articles in Comparative Politics, West European Politics, Latin American Research Review, Publius: The Journal of Federalism, Studies in Comparative International Development, Current History, and Latin American Politics and Society.

THOMAS F. O'BRIEN is John and Rebecca Moores Professor in the Department of History at the University of Houston. His most recent book, The Making of the Americas: U.S. Latin American Relations from the Age of Revolutions to the Era of Globalization, offers a synthetic interpretation of interactions between the United States and the people of Latin America. His two previous books, The Century of American Capitalism in Latin America and The Revolutionary Mission: American Enterprise in Latin America, 1900–1945, explored the role of U.S. corporations in the American mission of transformation in the Western Hemisphere. O'Brien is currently researching the Latin American roots of U.S.-driven globalization in the twentieth century.

308 Latin American Research Review

JUAN CARLOS ESPARZA OCHOA is a Ph.D. candidate in sociology at the University of Texas at Austin. He is a member of the Project of Religion and Economic Change. His research interests include religion, development, and ethnicity, particularly in Latin America. He is currently researching the relationship of Protestant missions, Catholic pastoral activity, and quality of life in Latin America.

TIMOTHY J. POWER is the director of the Latin American Centre at the University of Oxford. His research interests include political parties, elections, and executive-legislative relations in Brazil. From 2004 to 2006 he served as president of the Brazilian Studies Association, and he is currently an associate fellow of the Latin American and Caribbean Research Project at Chatham House. His most recent book, coedited with Peter Kingstone, is Democratic Brazil Revisited (University of Pittsburgh Press, 2008).

ROBERTA RICE is an assistant professor in the Department of Social Sciences at the University of Toronto at Scarborough. Her work has appeared in Comparative Political Studies. Her research examines the emergence and institutionalization of indigenous political movements in Latin America.

AMY ROBINSON is assistant professor of Latin American literature and culture at Bowling Green State University. She received her doctorate from the University of Minnesota. Her research interests include the representation of bandits and rebellion in Mexican literature, nineteenth-century Latin American literature and society, and discursive constructions of national and local identities.

LYNN STEPHEN, Distinguished Professor of Anthropology at the University of Oregon, has centered her work on the intersection of culture and politics. She is also the director of an emerging center for Latino/a and Latin American studies at the University of Oregon. Her most recent book is Transborder Lives: Indigenous Oaxacans in Mexico, California, and Oregon (Duke University Press, 2007). Her current research is focused on writing the textual and digital ethnography Making Rights a Reality: The Oaxaca Social Movement 2006–Present, as well as continuing work with the Otros Saberes project of the Latin American Studies Association and a coedited volume on violence and reconciliation in Latin America.

SUSAN C. STOKES is John S. Saden Professor of Political Science at Yale University and the director of the Yale Program on Democracy. Her recent books include Mandates and Democracy: Neoliberalism by Surprise in Latin America (Cambridge University Press, 2001) and Democracy and the Culture of Skepticism: Political Trust in Argentina and Mexico (with Matthew Cleary, Russell Sage Foundation, 2006). Her current research interests include clientelism and vote buying in new democracies, and the economic backdrop to the rise of left parties in Latin America.

MARK THURNER is associate professor of history and anthropology at the University of Florida. He is the author of From Two Republics to One Divided: Contradictions of Postcolonial Nationmaking in Andean Peru (Duke University Press, 1997), and coeditor of After Spanish Rule: Postcolonial Predicaments of the Americas (Duke University Press, 2003). His more recent writing and research concerns the history of history and museums in Peru and in the Hispanic world at large.

JOHN P. TUMAN is an associate professor of political science, and the director of the Institute for Latin American Studies, University of Nevada, Las Vegas. His research focuses on the political economy of developing areas.

GREGORY WEEKS is an associate professor of political science at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. He is the author of The Military and Politics in Postauthoritarian Chile (2003) and U.S. and Latin American Relations (2008). He is currently finishing a book, coauthored with John R. Weeks, on Latin American immigration to the United States.

HIROTOSHI YOSHIOKA is a Ph.D. candidate in sociology and demography at the University of Texas at Austin. His research interests include demography, indigenous peoples, racial and ethnic relations, and internal and international migration, with an emphasis in Central America and Mexico. Currently he is writing his dissertation, in which he explores the effect of remittance on indigenous communities and its impact on poverty and inequality in Guatemala and Nicaragua.

CESAR ZUCCO JR. is a fellow at the Center for the Study of Democratic Politics at Princeton University (2007–2008) and will be an invited professor at the Instituto Universitário de Pesquisas do Rio de Janeiro in 2008–2009. His research interests include executive-legislative relations, elections, and ideology in Latin America, as well as quantitative political methods. He received his Ph.D. in political science from UCLA in 2007, with his dissertation "The Political Economy of Ordinary Politics in Latin America." His work has appeared recently in Electoral Studies and the Journal of Latin American Studies.