Joint Development of Common Offshore Oil and Gas Deposits: "Mere" State Practice or Customary International Law?
David M. Ong	771
Offshore petroleum deposits straddling maritime boundaries or located in areas of overlapping claims are increasingly subject to joint development agreements. Today no general international law requires joint development agreements in such circumstances despite their common use. Rather, states have a duty to cooperate in good faith to establish an agreement for the development of these resources and an obligation of mutual restraint until that duty is fulfilled. Often the duty to cooperate will inexorably lead to joint development agreements.
Duty and Discretion in Commercial Arbitration
William W. Park	805
International arbitration implicates complex relationships between the place of arbitration and the location of the party's assets, which have been highlighted by cases recognizing foreign awards despite their vacatur at the arbitral situs. The author examines the extent to which enforcement of vacated awards comports with the parties' expectations and arbitration's treaty framework. The author suggests that the United States enact a statute clarifying the role and scope of federal judicial supervision of international commercial arbitration.
