On the cover: Bolshevism on Trial, released in April 1919 as the Red Scare escalated, was one of the first and more prominent of a number of anti-communist films released during the era. It had been adapted from a 1909 anti-socialist novel by Thomas Dixon, who had also written The Clansman, which influenced the D. W. Griffith film Birth of a Nation. Governor Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts, soon to become an anti-communist hero, wrote to the New England distribution manager: "I think the idea of the film, Bolshevism on Trial, is very timely. We surely need to educate our people along the lines your picture depicts. I hope it will be very successful."
