

excellent photographs, not only of the rites themselves but of the theme of death and resurrection in Christian art. In addition there are given practical suggestions—and how necessary these are nowadays, in a secular society which has infected even Catholic families with its superstitious attitude to death—which should help to make a house of mourning into a house of hope. The lit candles and the holy water, the communal prayers and procession, are more than relics of another age's faith: they are signs which should animate the Christian community when one of its members has been called to eternity.
