DAVID ANDERSON of Moredun. By A. Campbell Swinton of Kimmerghame.

Mr. David Anderson of Moredun, who died in Edinburgh in his ninetieth year, was the eldest son of Mr. Samuel Anderson of Moredun, banker in this city, the head of a family many members of which have been well known and highly respected. Mr. Anderson was long a leading partner in the banking house of Sir William Forbes & Company, and when that firm was, in 1838, merged in the establishment now known as the Union Bank of Scotland, he continued for many years an active director of the new body. There was no citizen of Edinburgh, whose generous aid was more readily given, to every object which commended itself to his approval as likely to benefit his countrymen of any class or condition; and consequently there is no one whose loss will be more seriously felt, when any measure of public utility is in contemplation. He was elected a Fellow of the Society in 1849, but never took an active part in its proceedings. He was, however, a man of cultivated taste and varied information, whose warm heart and genial disposition made him a universal favourite among a large circle of friends. And as one of the Trustees of Fettes College, he showed his interest in the higher education of the country by endowing two scholarships of the annual value of £100 each, with a view of enabling distinguished pupils of that school to prosecute their studies at one or other of the English universities.

JOHN M'CULLOCH. By Francis Brown Douglas.

Mr. John M'Culloch was a native of Galloway, born in 1807. He died at Edinburgh 13th July 1882, in the 76th year of his age. After attending classes at the Glasgow University he came to this city, when he entered the British Linen Company Bank, and remained in connection with it for a period of fifty-five years, much esteemed for his probity and business habits. Many a journey he undertook to bring gold from London for the bank's purposes, and to take it back when no longer required.

He had a kindly feeling for the poor and helpless, and was