

How to Find a Publisher in Political Science

Christopher J. Kelaher, Chatham House Publishers
Edward Artinian, Chatham House Publishers

The questions asked most frequently of editors in attendance at APSA meetings are "How do I get my book published?" and "Who should publish my book?" To help prospective authors, we have compiled a list of companies and editors working in political science. We have also tried to identify important questions to ask when seeking publication. This information should provide a valuable base from which to work when searching for a publisher. We hope it will save authors and publishers time, money, and effort.

The criteria for inclusion in our list are attendance and exhibits at national and regional political science meetings and advertising in publications such as the American Political Science Review. We should point out that new publishers are always entering the political science field. Marketing strategies differ from one organization to another. Thus, this list may not be inclusive; we apologize for any omissions and promise to amend future lists in accordance with additional information we may receive.

It is possible for authors to pose a number of questions requiring quantitative responses from publishers. The answers to such questions reveal a great deal about a publisher's expectations for a book, its market, and the publisher's approach to that market. These questions might include:

- (1) How many copies would be printed, in cloth and/or simultaneously in paper?
- (2) At what price would the book be sold?
- (3) How many free copies, if any, does the publisher expect to give away? (Adoption-market vehicles will demand more free copies.)

It is advisable for authors to examine a publisher's catalog, exhibits, and advertising. These also reveal much about the company's products and approach, and they allow a writer to gain a feel for that company's presence in the marketplace.

About the Authors

Christopher J. Kelaher did his undergraduate work at the University of Dayton and received a master's degree in political science from the University of Wisconsin. Edward Artinian has been a member of APSA since 1961; he did his undergraduate work at Brown University and received a master's degree in business from Columbia University.

An Epidemic of Cheating?*

Donald Chisholm, University of California, Los Angeles

An essay final exam is given, the exams graded and returned to the students. One, dissatisfied with her grade, steals her roommate's exam, puts the cover from her bluebook on it, and tells the instructor that there must have been an error in the way her grade was recorded.

A student copies an entire article from the American Political Science Review and turns it in as his own. The instructor is initially impressed with the paper, but becomes suspicious when the student discusses how he computed the tau-beta's.

Each member of a group of five students in one course prepares for a single section of the syllabus, and then trades answers with other members of the group during the final exam.

These tales are true. They happen to come from my experiences at several universities. Unfortunately, these are not rare, isolated occurrences. To judge from reports in the popular press, we are mired in an ever deepening morass of academic dishonesty. "An Epidemic of College Cheating!" declares one recent article in the Los Angeles Times.¹ A second trumpets: "Study Finds Cheating Joins 3 Rs as a Basic College Skill."² The Chronicle of Higher Education reports "Survey at Rutgers Suggests that Cheating May Be on the Rise at Large Universities."³ A Maryland university official tells us that "Honesty is becoming a more negoti-
