The War of the Dispossessed

Honduras and El Salvador, 1969

By Thomas P. Anderson

Opening with a review of Central American politics and economic development, the author explores in depth the grave problems—overpopulation, poverty, dependence on an undiversified agricultural economy—that Honduras and El Salvador have faced in modern times. He then examines the conflict itself and its ramifications for stability and economic integration in Central America.

Anderson, who was in El Salvador when the war broke out, makes extensive use of interviews with leading figures in the two countries. In addition, he was the first researcher to gain access to classified materials in the files of the two foreign ministries. xiv, 202 pages, bibliography, notes, index, maps. $15.95
