Musical notation for LUTE, CHORUS, PRAISE-SHOUTER, and RATTLE. The LUTE part is a melodic line in G major with a treble clef. The CHORUS part has the lyrics "-ta-ne an sha zun-gu-ra". The PRAISE-SHOUTER part has the lyrics "Ka bar mana rowa bai Kyautu ba; Ka bar mana rowa bai". The RATTLE part is a rhythmic pattern of eighth notes with a double bar line at the beginning.

This unique ethnography describes and analyzes the pre-Islamic Bori cult of Spirit-Possession in Hausa culture. Drawing upon interviews with participants, tape recordings of cult events, photos, and field observations, the author explains the use of trance states to both identify and cure illnesses and to initiate deviant people into a social group. All elements of the cult event (spirits, music, symbols, illnesses, and treatments) are discussed. Special attention is given to the influence of the cult music on the ritual structure and the possession-trance, whereby the musical system is based on rules of order as opposed to a simple linear order of elements. Music and lyrics, recorded by the author, appear in a special appendix, preserving this information for future studies of African music. A rare and exhaustively researched contribution to African ethnography in general and ethnomusicology in particular.

COLONIAL BUREAUCRACY AND CREATING UNDERDEVELOPMENT:

Tanganyika, 1919–1940

By Dennis M. P. McCarthy

Two of the most cutting problems of the 20th century are underdevelopment and government bureaucracy in developing nations.

Colonial Bureaucracy and Creating Underdevelopment shows the bureaucratic economy in action and highlights its impact on individual persons. This is a concisely written work that uses de-classified evidence from European archives, and material from the Tanzanian National Archives which is not easily accessible to Western scholars.

The bureaucratic economy, over-regulation, and the consequent distortions and disarticulations analyzed as internally generated forms of underdevelopment are the concerns of this book.

This is the first "inside story" that begins to relate the histories of underdevelopment and African colonial government bureaucracy in the deliberate manner both these important phenomena require. McCarthy gives the first systematic micro-analysis of the inner workings and perceptions of an African colonial bureaucracy that probes in depth the harmful consequences of its efforts to manipulate economic change.

McCarthy discusses extraction in the sense of excessive self-servicing and demonstrates distortions in exchange articulation, market articulation, factor allocation, and economic communication. He also includes a brief history of Tanganyika and sketches the geography of the area, some social and political customs, and aspects of indigenous economic life.

As the first study of its kind, Colonial Bureaucracy and Creating Underdevelopment is a major contribution to African historiography, the economic history of developing regions, and the history of bureaucratic economies. The book examines all aspects of the bureaucratic economy in detail. It discusses the general problem of stability in relation to internal administrative structures and their extensions and also focuses on the bureaucratic economy itself—its axioms of organization and calculus of maximization and minimization.
