A CLUE TO THE CRETAN SCRIPTS

F. M. STAWELL

". . . deserves the closest consideration . . . achieves remarkable results . . . is exceedingly suggestive. . . . The author brings to her task an intimate knowledge not only of the subject-matter in Crete with which she deals, but also of the other early civilisations with which there are Cretan contacts. Nor is she lacking in two qualities, courage and ingenuity, essential for such a task."

The Agamemnon of Aeschylus

A revised text, edited, with an introduction; a verse translation, and critical notes, by J. C. LAWSON

Demy 8vo. 15s. net

The editor conceives his task as follows: first, to present the text in the form in which Aeschylus wrote it, or in such form as would have given unalloyed pleasure to an audience of Aeschylus's contemporaries; and, secondly, to provide an English rendering faithful to the thought and form of the original, and sufficiently literal to bring out its construction and idiom. The notes are intended to subservise only these two purposes, by justifying departures from the traditional text or by explaining the emphasis and the nuance of a particular word or phrase.

by J. HARWARD*

Vol. I. Translation in Rhythmical Prose with Literary Comments. 18s. net.
Vols. II and III, Critical Commentary and Text. 30s. net.

"English scholars have not of late paid much attention to Pindar, and this edition has distinct attractions. Dr. Farnell has had the good sense to see that verse, however brilliant, goes some way from Pindar's text and characteristic manner. His prose of a Biblical sort reads well. . . . The Comments add much to the value of Dr. Farnell's edition."—Vernon Rendall in "The Saturday Review."
