1880. This school, which was connected with Queen's College and with the Birmingham Clinical Board, was recognized by the Royal College of Surgeons of England in 1880 and finally approved by that corporation in 1881. Three dental professorships were created in 1880, and these chairs were retained in Mason's College when the medical and dental faculties of Queen's College were transferred to Mason's College in 1882.

Mason's College became Birmingham University in 1900, and the new university had from its commencement a medical faculty incorporating a dental department. Birmingham University was the first in this country to grant dental degrees. The story of the early struggles of the hospital and school and of their subsequent achievements is an inspiring one and Mr. Cohen, who is one of our leading dental historians, tells it with admirable brevity and spirit.
