

and the specialist will be disappointed by their brevity. In a way, the same can be said about the whole book. One may only add that in retrospect the author appears to have been much too optimistic regarding the degree of decentralization introduced (or even presaged) by the Soviet economic reform of 1965. At this writing it is fairly clear, at least to the reviewer, that the reform's effects on the systemic features and efficiency of the Soviet economy have been very close to zero.

GREGORY GROSSMAN

University of California, Berkeley

SOVIET ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT. By Raymond Hutchings. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1971. xiii, 314 pp. £3.25, cloth. £1.50, paper.

Mr. Hutchings's book covers much of the same material as previous text surveys of the Soviet economic system and its development, but is different in being more chronological and less analytical than most, relying more on the telling detail than on the judicious generalization to develop its message. Indeed, it is a distinctly idiosyncratic book. The concept seems to be to describe some phenomena, illustrate with a few data, flavor with arcana and a little exotica (the errata have been well controlled), and that will convey what is important about the Soviet economy. Some chapters (those on geography and history, for instance) succeed much better than others (those on investment planning and ideology, say). The book is well written, and raises a number of interesting points, but it gives somewhat the impression of a collection of asides to the main flow of discourse in our research efforts on the Soviet system. On one important and complicated problem—the ambiguities in the measurement of growth—the points it makes are unexceptionable, but its treatment of the capital intensity controversy and Soviet practice in this area is badly garbled. There is relatively little reliance for results and analytical approaches on the research done by those outside the USSR, in favor of Soviet assertions and views. This makes it more authentic in a certain sense, but less solid and conclusive than one would like in a book to be used as a text.

ROBERT W. CAMPBELL

Indiana University

ANNUAIRE DE L'INSTITUT DE PHILOGIE ET D'HISTOIRE ORIENTALES ET SLAVES, vols. 18 and 19. Dedicated to Boris Unbegaun. Brussels: Université Libre de Bruxelles, 1968. Vol. 18: xxxii, 516 pp. 750 fr.b. Vol. 19: 282 pp. 350 fr.b. Set, 1,000 fr.b.

This two-volume Festschrift, with all but four of its forty-seven contributions from fifteen countries written in French, German, or Russian, represents a happy division of labor with two university presses of the English-speaking world. A companion volume, Studies in Slavic Linguistics and Poetics in Honor of Boris O. Unbegaun, with contributions from thirty-one American, British, and Canadian scholars, was published in 1968 by New York University Press and the University of London Press (reviewed in the Slavic Review, March 1971). The present collection is prefaced with a biographical note and a bibliography of Professor Unbegaun's scholarly publications from 1923 to 1967; its continuous page numbering and single table of contents indicate that the two volumes (international contributions and Belgian contributions) should be considered one work.