CONTRIBUTORS

Hugh S. Gorman is an assistant professor of environmental history and policy at Michigan Technological University. He is currently working on a history of pollution control in the production, transportation, and refining sectors of the petroleum industry, which will be published by the University of Akron Press in the Technology and the Environment series.

Christine Meisner Rosen is an associate professor of business and public policy at the Haas School of Business at the University of California, Berkeley. She is the author of The Limits of Power: Great Fires and the Process of City Growth in America (1986), and is working on a book about the history of industrial pollution control in the U.S. from the 1840s to the present. She recently published articles on industrial stench nuisances during the Industrial Revolution in Historical Geography, and on differing perspectives on the costs and benefits of pollution control in the New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania courts in Geographical Review. She is also the author of "Industrial Ecology and the Greening of Business History," Business and Economic History (Fall 1997): 123-137.

Christopher Sellers is an associate professor of history at the State University of New York at Stony Brook. He has studied at Yale, the University of North Carolina, and Johns Hopkins, and has taught at Yale, the New Jersey Institute of Technology, and Rutgers University-Newark. The author of Hazards of the Job: From Industrial Disease to Environmental Health Science (1997), he is now at work on an ecocultural history of twentieth-century American suburbs.

David Stradling is an assistant professor in the Federated Department of History at the New Jersey Institute of Technology and Rutgers University-Newark. His book on air pollution control, Smokestacks and Progressives: Environmentalists, Engineers, and Air Quality in America, 1881-1951, is published by the Johns Hopkins University Press. He is currently working on a history of the Catskill Mountains.

Joel A. Tarr is the Richard S. Caliguri Professor of History & Policy at Carnegie Mellon University. He is currently writing, with Clay McShane, a study of the horse and the city. His most recent publications include an article he co-wrote with Jeffrey Stine, entitled "At the Intersection of Histories: Technology and the Environment," which appeared in Technology and Culture (October 1998). He also co-edited, with Mark Rose, a special issue of the Journal of Urban History (March 1999) on the city and technology.

Frank Uekoetter studied history and the social sciences at the universities of Freiburg and Bielefeld in Germany and at the Johns Hopkins University. He is a member of the Graduate School of the Institute for Science and Technology Studies (IWT) at the University of Bielefeld, and is currently completing a Ph.D. dissertation entitled "Air Pollution Control in Germany and the United States of America, 1880-1970."

Christian Warren is a social historian of the modern United States. He is the author of Brush With Death: A Social History of Lead Poisoning, which is forthcoming from the Johns Hopkins University Press. He is currently working on a study of popular and scientific ideas about the effects of climate upon racial differences in vitality, physical power, and fertility, and how these ideas have shaped the nation's regional cultures.
