

Book Reviews

women. Each has made crucial contributions. Dame Cicely Saunders, if anyone, is entitled to write about 'The evolution of hospices' because she is certainly the most important single figure in their recent evolution. Instead, she rambles on with a few not very well-chosen words which are a mockery of her powerful incisive writing on this subject elsewhere. Next, Jennifer Beinart, who has written brilliantly on obstetric pain, writes instead on the growth of treatment of intractable pain. Her after-dinner chapter appears to be based on after-dinner chats with John Lloyd. It is not explained why John Lloyd, who is in rude health and very interesting, should not write on the subject himself. Last of the three, Wendy Savage, an obstetrician of considerable importance, writes a chapter entitled 'The management of obstetric pain', instead of Dr Beinart. Needless to say, Mrs Savage writes that the idea of management by other people of a very personal experience is anathema to her. I completely agree with her, but her chapter is at the same time irrelevant and excellent.

I can hardly bear to comment on the other chapters. There is a certain humour in Helen King's, enticingly titled 'The early anodynes: pain in the ancient world'. One has a feeling that she was press-ganged into writing about pains where we do not understand what the ancients were talking about, and nostrums whose contents are unknown, given in unknown dosages, and of unknown efficacy.

There is no doubt that a serious and fascinating book could be written with this title and with these chapter headings. This is not that book. Even these authors could write such a book, but they didn't.

P. D. Wall
University College London

MARIS A. VINOVSIS, An "epidemic" of adolescent pregnancy? Some historical and policy considerations, New York and Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1988, 8vo, pp. xix, 284, £22.50.

This book will be of more interest to those concerned with the process of formulating policy in the United States than to historians. It is a collection of essays dealing with the problems of designing, implementing, and evaluating programmes for dealing with adolescent pregnancy. The detailed analysis of the groups involved in federal policy formation is leavened to an extent by a cursory attempt to put adolescent pregnancy in historical perspective. The book does not, however, address the wider issues of the experience of sexuality that the topic raises. For example, although there is a chapter on the young fathers, most of the essays discuss policies designed for "adolescents", without noticing that it is young women who are to be monitored and whose behaviour is to be policed. Vinovskis ignores this point in his discussion of the parental-notification controversy. Since the proponents of notification aimed to ensure that parents were informed when a minor was provided with a prescription birth control drug or device, it is clear that it was the privacy of girls that would be invaded, while boys could still freely purchase non-prescription condoms. Here the historical insight that Vinovskis claims is so valuable in putting current preoccupations into perspective eludes him. Had notification been implemented, it would have continued to uphold the double standard in social policy which feminists have always attacked, most notably in the campaign against the Contagious Diseases Acts in Victorian England.

The book makes a plea for more and better input into public policy by social scientists. The problem is that policy makers are likely to be more concerned with remaining in office than in learning the lessons that history might offer.

Barbara Brookes
University of Otago

JOHANNES BÜTTNER and CHRISTA HABRICH, Roots of clinical chemistry. A guide through the Historical Exhibition on the occasion of the XIII International Congress of Clinical Chemistry 1987, The Hague, The Netherlands June 28–July 3, 1987, Darmstadt, GIT Verlag, 1987, 4to, pp. 158, illus., [no price stated].