A Progress of Sentiments

Reflections on Hume's Treatise

Annette Baier

In this book, Annette Baier argues that Hume's Treatise of Human Nature is a carefully crafted literary and philosophical work which itself displays a philosophical progress of sentiments. She describes how, by turning philosophy toward human nature instead of toward God and the universe, Hume initiated a new philosophy, a broader discipline of reflection that can embrace Darwin and Foucault as well as Freud.

MIND

VOLUME 100

Editor: Professor Mark Sainsbury, King's College, London

MIND is the best known British philosophical journal and one of the most widely read and respected journals in professional philosophy. Founded in 1876, for over a century it has represented the leading philosophical ideas of its time. Under a succession of distinguished editors it has both expressed and given direction to currents of thought in epistemology, the philosophy of language, metaphysics and philosophical psychology. It has frequently been the vehicle for changing the way philosophers have approached their central problems. Its large circulation and resources make it a central forum for book reviews and critical notices, as well as for original papers and discussion notes.

Synthese publishes articles in the theory of knowledge, the general methodological problems of science, such as the problems of scientific discovery and scientific interest, of induction and probability, of causation and of the role of mathematics, statistics and logic in science, the methodological and foundational problems of the different departmental sciences, insofar as they have philosophical interest, those aspects of symbolic logic and of the foundations of mathematics which are relevant to the philosophy and methodology of science, and those facets of the history and sociology of science which are important for contemporary topical pursuits.
