Report on the Work of the Prison Department, 1983.
Cmnd 9306. London: HMSO. 1984. Pp 101.
£7.60.

The annual Prison Department report is now available in your local friendly Government Bookshop. As always it is lavishly illustrated with photographs such as 'a new living unit at Feltham Youth Custody Centre' (without a living thing in the picture). This year the Director-General begins his personal report by telling us '1983 was a year rich in incident for the Prison Service'. Ominous and correct. The Deputy Director-General goes on to tell us of the serious disturbances that took place at Albany and Wormwood Scrubs, the former incident being ended by a MUFTI squad. MUFTI stands for Minimum Use of Force Tactical Intervention and the squad is armed with batons and shields. He also reports 11 hostage-taking incidents, the highest total ever in a single year; an Assistant Governor at Parkhurst was held hostage for two days.

Training in techniques for dealing with hostage incidents is therefore a priority.

The Report makes no attempt to explain these sinister developments. The population figures remain at totally unacceptably high levels (average daily population of 43,500) and more people (17,055) than in any year, except 1980, are in double or triple cells. 'The pursuit of greater efficiency and the improvement of management are not separate from the pursuit of humane and purposeful prison conditions', the Director-General tells us. There is even a chapter on 'The Prison Service and Society', but this deals with things such as Boards of Visitors, the Press Office, and staff trips abroad. Presumably the new building programme of 14 prisons and 10,600 prison places is part of the response to the crisis, but is it really cost-effective in a modern society to keep on building more prison places? New prisons to replace the old ones, yes, but more prison cells? Hasn't that something to do with 'The Prison Service
