

Announcing Publication of
THE ACADEMIES OF VIRGINIA, 1776-1861
by Dale G. Robinson

This is the first and only work devoted solely to secondary education in Virginia (including West Virginia, and Kentucky until 1792) during the period. Every aspect of the academies is described, frequently through the writings of contemporary sources.

In his foreword, Professor H. Woody Writes:

The author of this useful study gives a close look at an indigenous institution without boring the reader with a mass of names, dates, and tedious statistics. Rather, in easy to read chapters he offers the necessary chronology and illustrative detail. Practitioners of modern educational methods may be given pause as they reflect on the manner of a primitive order. . . . This interesting book is likely to find many thoughtful readers.

Education and Society in Modern Europe

By Fritz K. Ringer

Ringer has made an exhaustive analysis of European secondary and higher education and social classes from the late eighteenth century to 1960 and in doing so has overturned many accepted assumptions about the relationship between education systems and society. ". . . a fresh and subtle discussion . . . extremely lucid explanations."

Urban Education in the Nineteenth Century

D. A. Reeder

The essays in this volume provide an overview of recent work in the comparative history of city schooling. The studies, by leading American and British historians, emphasize contemporary attitudes toward city life and its problems, especially child life and the consequences of urban change.

Education in Rural England 1800-1914

Pamela Horn

Education in Rural England 1800-1914 is a comprehensive and fully documented account of school life as experienced in rural districts of England and Wales before the First World War. The author surveys various aspects of nineteenth-century education—the development of teaching as a profession; administrative trends; changes in the curriculum; the training, education, and background of rural children and their teachers.
