

CHARLES MORGAN and the Development of Southern Transportation

By James P. Baughman. The growth of transportation in the South is traced through the career of Charles Morgan (1795–1878) in this business biography which depicts the man, but also his times, and shows the interaction of a business decision-maker and the political and economic framework that influenced that decision-making. Morgan became the greatest steamship specialist of his day and a railroader of note. Already established in the 1830s, he benefited financially from the Mexican War, the Gold Rush, and the Civil War. Morgan's empire—the Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Line—finally was absorbed into the vast Southern Pacific Company. $10.00

BLUEPRINT FOR MODERN AMERICA: Nonmilitary Legislation of the First Civil War Congress

By Leonard P. Curry. The role of the federal government in generally directing the nation's economy and in subsidizing and regulating certain enterprises and industries expanded greatly during the early Civil War years. The author discusses the far-reaching legislation (including the Legal Tender Act, the Pacific Railway Act, the Homestead Act, the Land-Grant College Act, the Emancipation Proclamation, and the acts establishing a new tax structure and a tariff system) of the 37th Congress (1861–63) and its impact on the social and economic development of the nation. $8.50

OUTDOOR ADVERTISING

History and Regulation

John W. Houck, editor

From signs on barns to a $500 million investment in billboard equipment, the history of standardized outdoor advertising in the United States reveals an exciting and intriguing chapter in the development of a major American industry. The illustrations which accompany the history add further interest to this great piece of Americana.

The coverage of the history and current status of outdoor advertising leads naturally to criticism of its contribution to the nation's aesthetic blight. Methods of control discussed include police and zoning regulations and the effects of the Federal Highway Beautification Act of 1965. The future of the industry is considered in relation to long range planning and a new accommodation to regulation.

The Unbound Prometheus
*Technological Change and Industrial Development in Western Europe
from 1750 to the Present*

David S. Landes

Professor Landes's study covering this subject from 1750 to 1914, which first appeared in Volume 6 of The Cambridge Economic History of Europe, has now been extended with a full-scale analysis of modern industrial Europe from the first World War to the 1950's.

He covers the effect of the war in accelerating the dissolution of the old international economy, the reasons for monetary instability and the consequences of monetary difficulties for the economic history of Europe, and discusses the economic crisis of 1929-1932.

Finally he examines the reasons for Western Europe's unprecedented economic growth since the 1950's and raises the question of whether this is a temporary phenomenon or the first stage in a new trend, reflecting an acceleration in technological advance.
