

of the contributors to this volume, I am fully aware that the area of Poland was multinational and would like to see work done on non-Polish women within those territories, but I am not doing it and neither I nor my fellow contributors should be faulted for the “exclusively Polish” nature of our work. That is what we know and it is what we are writing about. If I live long enough and have learned enough about the subject matter of women within Polish territories, perhaps I can expand my work. But, for the time being, I would like it considered within my own framework and not someone else’s.

To the Editor:

I am writing to state my objections to Michael Katz’s review of Robin Miller’s excellent book on The Brothers Karamazov (Winter 1994). Professor Katz opens by stating that the book’s intended audience “is high school students and undergraduates coming to Dostoevskii’s novel for the first time,” a statement that would undoubtedly surprise the Twayne series editors and may mislead the review audience into believing that it is not intended for us—college teachers, graduate students and Dostoevskii specialists. As a Dostoevskii specialist, I do not think it hyperbolic to claim that this small book will be on reading lists and in the bibliographies of major scholars for as long as serious scholarship on Dostoevskii continues. Professor Katz next disregards the series format and criticizes the book’s first three sections for their brevity and content without, however, tackling Miller’s claims about the role of Russian censorship in the history of this and other great Russian works, her argument that the debate between writers and radical critics over the topicality vs. the universality of literature is part of an ongoing debate about Russia’s future and identity that could not be discussed openly in the press, and her argument in defense of the canon: “I suspect that certain works, among them The Brothers Karamazov, will continue to be read, not because they subtly support the existence of certain reigning power structures, but because of their aesthetic qualities, their passion, and the frisson of recognition they incite in their readers.” Most seriously, Professor Katz neglects any mention of Miller’s discussion of Dostoevskii’s reader as an implicated reader, who, in The Brothers Karamazov, is confronted time and again with the problem of evil. Finally, he criticizes the author for a fault of the publisher’s—the omission of dates on one page of the chronology. This latter criticism especially bespeaks a bias that must be addressed.

Michael Katz replies:

Deborah Martensen misreads my review, which was largely positive. Some clarifications: although the “Guidelines for Authors” of the series claim that the studies are “intended, first, for college and university students,” the glossy brochure contains the following quotation from the School Library Journal: “These studies are well written and readable, and provide more depth than Cliff’s Notes ... [and] will be useful in all high school libraries.” As for the reading lists and bibliographies of major Dostoevsky scholars, I suspect that they are more likely to include Victor Terras’s Karamazov Companion (1981) and Robert Belknap’s Genesis of the Brothers Karamazov (1990). Re: my “bias that must be addressed.” I made no accusation. I merely pointed out that the dates on p. xii were missing.

To the Editor:

Alfred Rieber’s review of The Secret World of American Communism is both gratuitously nasty and filled with factual inaccuracies. He accuses us—with no evidence—of “frequently” engaging in “the notorious tactic of guilt by association.” When he does get around to discussing the documents in our book, he commits so many mistakes that we cannot respond to all of them in the one paragraph the editor has allotted us to reply. We will be pleased to send interested readers a more detailed response but, for now, let us note that Rieber confuses the CPUSA with the CPSU, confuses the Com-
