

From the Editor

THE COMMUNITY OF BUSINESS ETHICS and corporate social responsibility scholars is indebted to Gary Weaver for his tireless efforts over the last six years to promote excellence in business ethics scholarship as the editor of Business Ethics Quarterly. Under Gary's leadership, BEQ published a large body of impactful and theoretically innovative conceptual, normative, and empirical scholarship. Under my editorship the journal will continue to emphasize high quality multidisciplinary and cross-disciplinary scholarship that makes novel theoretical contributions to the field. Achieving this end can be accomplished only with the aid of our distinguished team of associate editors. A review of this issue's masthead will reveal that associate editors Bruce Barry, Heather Elms, Jerry Goodstein, Wayne Norman, Guido Palazzo, Andreas Georg Scherer, and Alan Strudler all continue in their current roles, as do managing editor Libby Scott and book review editor Al Gini. In addition, Gary Weaver has taken on the new role of Senior Associate Editor. The editorial board has seen a number of transitions, but continues to represent a wide range of disciplines and expertise. We are grateful to our esteemed board members for their expertise and service. Longtime readers of BEQ will notice some minor changes to article headings beginning with this issue, but this is one of the few changes readers will notice. Our commitment to publishing scholarship in multiple disciplines and across disciplines, such as management, philosophy, organization science, marketing, and accounting, remains unwavering. In an era when many academic journals reject cross-disciplinary scholarship, we continue to believe that such scholarship is important to theory development regarding the ethics of business and is a distinctive strength of BEQ.
