SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN CHINA

AN ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY
BY GENEVIEVE C. DEAN

This bibliography indicates the current state of knowledge about Chinese science and technology, with concentration on the period since 1949. Nearly 1,000 entries list books, articles, unpublished papers and dissertations that have appeared in the English, European and Japanese languages up to the end of 1972. Arranged within five broad categories covering science and technology in relation to growth, policy and activity, the work provides a reference guide to important secondary source materials which range from analyses of visits to China to reviews and other bibliographical aids.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHINA MARKET: Prospects for Sino-American Trade

by Edward Neilan and Charles R. Smith

The authors, both news reporters who specialize in Asian affairs, contend that China provides American businessmen with important opportunities for trade and finance. The study, published jointly by AEI and the Hoover Institution, includes the findings of the authors' poll of leading American government, banking and academic specialists on China trade. They discuss political, social and defense considerations, as well as the short- and long-term prospects for Sino-American trade.

MALAYSIA, A Case Study in Successful Development

by Wolfgang Kasper

Wolfgang Kasper analyzes Malaysia as one of the frequently overlooked, relatively successful cases of development. What are the factors behind the relative development success of Malaysia? What lessons can be drawn for development policy in other less developed countries? These two questions are the focus for this exhaustive and provocative study.
