Social Consequences of Modernization in Communist Societies

edited by Mark G. Field

Does the process of modernization create a uniform type of society wherever it takes place or is the experience of Communist societies so unique, as their leaders claim, as to produce a totally different social order? Eleven social scientists debate this issue. They explore such topics as modernization theory; the role of the Communist Party in a mature society; the Chinese model of development; a comparison of Soviet and Chinese urbanization; social stratification, psychological stress, and deviance. Their comparisons will be of interest to specialists in a broad range of disciplines, including sociology, political science, economics, and social medicine. $14.50
