THE ORIENTAL QUESTION, 1840–1900

Files from the Royal Archives, Windsor Castle

This material is indispensable for scholars and students who are interested not only in the Eastern Question but also in the major trends in British foreign policy in the nineteenth century. Containing letters of leading political figures and Queen Victoria, these papers are also an important source for understanding the political processes in Victorian England.

—Drs. Charles and Barbara Jelavich

Professors of History
Indiana University

These remarkably full records from the Royal Archives are an important addition to what has for long been available in the Public Record Office and elsewhere. They will be valuable to historians for the way in which they illuminate the interplay of personalities at the highest level of British government and for the light they throw on a set of interrelated issues which preoccupied European statesmen more continuously than any other during the second half of the nineteenth century.

—Dr. M.S. Anderson

Professor of International History
The London School of Economics and Political Science

The history of British foreign relations in the nineteenth century is a record of shifting policies, strategies, and alignments. The years 1840–1900 were especially marked by changes in Britain's response to the new political realities shaping modern Europe. The names of the great architects of international policy—Palmerston, Disraeli, Gladstone—illuminate the alternate paths of British policy, paths that led to determined intervention, to caution and withdrawal. One issue of great importance for the direction of British policy in these years was the Eastern Question—the problems brought about by the decline of the Ottoman Empire and the future of the European balance of power. The Eastern Question was a continuing diplomatic problem in the nineteenth century.

The significance of the Eastern Question (or, as it is called in the Royal Archives, the Oriental Question) is clearly seen in the correspondence, memoranda, and policy analyses found in the Royal Archives. University Publications of America has now been granted permission to make available for the first time the complete series of files on this subject. These include Queen Victoria's correspondence with her ministers, the principal papers of state forwarded to the Queen for her consideration, and her correspondence with other European sovereigns and members of their families. This unique and invaluable source of primary material, preserved in excellent condition and published in a convenient microfilm edition, provides a research opportunity to scholars in a wide range of fields. Numbering nearly 40,000 manuscript pages—reproduced in their entirety—these records offer an unusually intimate look at British diplomatic history. They provide an insight into the struggle for control of foreign policy, with its contest of strong personalities and its effect on the course of European history, and into the making of Britain's place in Europe as it moved into the twentieth century.

The following topics are among the major ones covered in this collection: the Turco-Egyptian War, the Straits Convention, the Holy Places issue, Palmerstonian politics, the Vienna Note, the Crimean War, the question of the Balkan Principalities, the Hatt-I Humayun (Christian Reform Edict), the Bulgarian atrocities, interest in the Suez Canal, the Crete insurrection, the Constantinople Conference, the Russo-Turkish War, the Treaty of San Stephano, the Congress of Berlin, division of the Balkans into independent states and spheres of influence, the Syrian expedition, and the First and Second Mediterranean Agreements.

This collection makes readily available a source whose value has long been recognized by scholars for the light it sheds both on British foreign policy in a vital area of the world and on the internal politics that helped shape it.

—Dr. Paul W. Schroeder
Professor of History

University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

The documents in the Royal Archives illuminate many aspects of the complex Eastern Question. They constitute a valuable supplement to the Foreign Office Records, both on matters of high policy and on personalities, and of course they include the Queen's frequent queries and admonitions.

A Study in the Writing of History

A.J. YOUNGSON

Professor Youngson produces two accounts of the 1745 Scottish rebellion, one sympathetic to the House of Stuart, the other to George II. Each of these accounts is based strictly on contemporary sources and contains all the principal facts of the case, yet the two versions are very different. In this thought-provoking book, the author shows the ways in which historians may select and present evidence so as to produce a history compatible with their own preferences and prejudices.
