COVER: Lumbering in Oregon about 1930. Throughout this decade, leaders of the lumber industry tried to stabilize their business through vigorous trade association activities encouraged by Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover. See article, pp. 358-379. Photograph courtesy of Baker Library, Harvard Business School.

The records business men leave have a kind of veracity that we do not find as a rule in political records. . . . The Business Historical Society and allied associations are providing material which is going to give us a more accurate foundation for judgment in other fields of history. — Victor S. Clark in an address to the first American conference on business history, Harvard University, December 30, 1930.

With this issue of the Business History Review, my name appears for the first time as Editor. My predecessors, listed above, have established an impressive standard through their work on this journal and through their own research—a standard which I will endeavor to maintain.

The Business History Review:

- Unites scholars from numerous disciplines who seek knowledge about business.
- Publishes research and reviews books from all over the world.
- Provides a home for those who feel that the strategy and structure of corporations are essential subjects for historical inquiry and that, in turn, the history of these subjects can illuminate corporate conduct today.
- Seeks to place business as an institution in its social, political, and economic context.
- Remains faithful to the conception of a business as a place run by human beings who make decisions and a place where leadership counts.

I hope to further this mission during my tenure as Editor.

All who value the work of this journal will, I am sure, join me in an expression of gratitude to Dr. James E. Fell, Jr. Jay was the individual responsible for bringing out the last three issues of the Review. His name will remain on the masthead as Managing Editor, and I look forward with enthusiasm to working with him.
