A CONTEMPORARY HISTORY CONFERENCE, at the University of Sussex, 2-4 July 1996

Theme: Reconstructing the family, society and the law in southern Europe 1945–1950 Call for Papers

What happens when wars end? How do people rebuild their lives and communities? The ending of the Second World War, together with the civil wars which accompanied it, provide the historian with a rich terrain in which to explore these questions.

In addition to the history of post-war state policies of reconstruction and repression, scholars are also starting to conduct research at a more local and intimate level.

The themes to be explored at this conference are envisaged as follows:

- The reconstitution of the family, including psychological after-effects of wartime loss and separation; coping with absence; the search for missing persons; the care of orphans; love affairs and marriages within small communities and their socio-political implications;
- Settling scores whether through 'rough justice', denunciations or trials; the nature of courtroom proceedings and judicial procedure as a social phenomenon; the role of the police in the immediate post-war period;
- Wartime property transfers and their post-war repercussions, including the scale and prevalence of looting; the role of the legal system in redressing wartime expropriations; the fate of war profiteers and blackmailers; the plight of returning Jewish survivors and the question of the restoration of their homes and shops after 1945.

The focus of this conference is the locality, understood as any level of the community – from the village to the city – below that of the state.

Proposals are invited from scholars working on Spain, France, Italy, Greece and Yugoslavia. We wish to encourage the participation of younger scholars and postgraduate students as well as well-established figures. Proposals for papers should take the form of abstracts of 250–500 words.

All enquiries should be addressed to:

Seminar

The Higher Institute of Labour Studies (HIVA) at the Katholieke Universiteit Leuven is organising an interdisciplinary seminar on Nationalist and Regionalist Dilemmas for Collective Action, due to take place in Leuven or Brussels on 7–8 December 1995. The seminar will investigate issues pertaining to the nationalist and regionalist challenges and dilemmas which confront European labour movements and is intended to provide a context for discussion of the labour movement's international co-operation and identity formation.
